

Building Control Solutions

Why do I need Building Control?

I have planning permission is that enough?

Not all building works require planning permission; however most do require Building Control approval. For example, structural alterations e.g. removing load bearing walls or chimney breasts, home extensions or loft conversions will need building control approval.

Even if you have planning permission you are still likely to require building control approval as well. You are required by law to submit a Building Regulations Application and if you are unsure whether your work will need building control approval we will be happy to advise you.

What we do

The Building Control process exists to ensure your new home or extension is safe, well built and energy efficient, meeting the standards set for today's homes, in accordance with Building Regulations. It is there to safeguard your home and those of your neighbours.

Our qualified building control surveyors will check your plans to ensure your proposed design and product specification meet the full range of building standards including; structural integrity, fire safety, acoustic performance, ventilation, accessibility and energy efficiency. Identifying potential problems at this stage will save you time, trouble and expense.

When you and your builder are ready to start on site, we will agree a schedule of inspections. This will enable us to check the works at critical stages of construction and help you and your builder with any technical queries as the build progresses. We offer a next day inspection service and are always just at the end of the telephone.

At the end of the project we will provide you with a completion certificate, which you will need when you come to sell your home and we will retain copies of both your plans and certificate should you need them in the future.
